RULES FOR SENECA CONCORDANCE.

Text - Peiper and Richter, 1902.

I. Parts of Speech.

1. Interjections are cited and quoted with words in close connection.
2. Prepositions are cited and quoted with dependent nouns. If a word is used both as an adverb and a preposition, the two uses are treated separately.
3. Coordinating conjunctions are simply cited. Subordinating conjunctions are cited and the main and dependent verbs are quoted. A few such as ut = as, sicut, prout, cen, tamquam are simply cited.
4. Adverbs are quoted with the word modified, except non which is simply cited. Comparative and superlative forms are given under the positive.
5. Adjectives are cited with the nouns modified. Degrees are treated as in the case of adverbs. Participles are treated under verbs.
6. Nouns are cited with adjective modifiers and enough words to show their construction in the sentence. Nouns that are personified are treated separately.
7. Pronouns are treated in the same manner as nouns. Some are simply cited: ego, hic, tu, is, ille, qui. Distinction is made between use of same word as pronoun and as adjective.

II

8. Verbs are cited and quoted with subject, object, and indirect object. The verb in a subordinate clause is quoted with the verb of the main clause and the conjunction introducing the subordinate clause.

II. Arrangement and Abbreviation.

1. Forms are arranged according to the order of the paradigm.
2. Punctuation of text, titles of speakers, Dramatis Personae, etc. are disregarded in quotations.
3. Harper's Latin Dictionary is followed for the indexform of a word.
4. Three dots (...) indicate the omission of a word or words, and / denotes the end of a line.
5. Phoenissae is abbreviated Pho.
6. In citations only the line in which the word actually occurs is given.

III. Variants.

Variants are in red ink and are bracketed. They are noted as follows:

1. If the index word occurs only in a variant, it is cited in brackets.
2. The brackets are made to begin and end where variants begin and cease to differ from the accepted text.
3. If the words of the accepted text are changed only in order, an asterisk (*) is put, with initials of mss. that vary in brackets, after the regular citation of each word that differs.

III.

4. When the difference is only in the spelling or case of a single word, that word is put in brackets after the regular citation.
5. Names of correctors of variants are inserted if corrections differ from the accepted text.
6. Conjectures are given under the name of the author. References to the literature are omitted.

An Examination of Recent Text - Critical Work upon the Tragedies of Seneca.

The manuscripts of Seneca's Tragedies have been a subject of much study and numerous articles have been written concerning them, especially in recent years. The monographs upon which this examination is based are the following:

E. C. Chickering: An Introduction to Octavia Praetexta, Diss., Columbia University, Jamaica, N. Y., 1910.

C. E. Stuart : The Interpolated Manuscripts of Seneca's Tragedies, Classical Quarterly, VI, 1912, pp. 1-20

J. Tolckehn: Bericht über die Tragödien Senecas, Jahresbericht über die Fortschritte d. klass. Altertumsw., Jahrg. XLIII, 1915, pp. 19 - 24

Th. Döring: Zur Überlieferung von Senecas Tragödien, Hermes XLVII, 1912, pp. 183 - 198.

Th. Döring: Ergänzung zu den Abhandlungen im Hermes 42 und 47, Progr., Lingen, Leipzig, 1913.

M. Manitius: Philologus LXIII, 1904, pp. 313 - 314.

At the present time all the existing manuscripts of Seneca's Tragedies are recognized to have belonged to two lines of tradition, A and E. The archetype of these two recensions dates back to a time probably as early as the second century of the Christian era.

At least by the end of the third century numerous errors had come into the parent text. (1) Late in the fourth century, a scholar rewrote the plays making such corrections as he saw fit and added a tenth play, the Octavia. This was the beginning of the A Recension from which most of the mss. still in existence have come.

The ms. called E was discovered by Johann Friedrich Gronov in 1640 in the Laurentian Library at Florence. He named it the Etruscus (E). It was written in the twelfth century (2). To the E tradition belong R, T, Σ. R, otherwise styled Fragmenta Rescripta Ambrosiana is a fifth century ms., which has been preserved in a peculiar way. Chickering tells the story (3) that in the eighth century, or thereabouts, a writer wishing to copy the Books of the Kings used a ms. of Plautus, the original writing of which had been erased. Eight new pages, however, were added from other sources, and five of these proved to belong to a ms. of Seneca. T, the Thueanus, is a ninth or tenth century ms. valuable because of its age. Σ is a copy of E now lost from which came M and N, two copies which have the Octavia at the end. (4) E, R, T are the only mss.

(2) Chickering, p. 65

(3) Ibid, p. 62

that were written before the middle of the fourteenth century.

Of the many editions of the Tragedies that have been prepared only the last two, those of Leo (Berlin, 1879) and of Peiper and Richter (Leipzig, 1902) have now any text - critical value. Leo followed the E family in constituting his text, and thought that the A mss. deserved little or no consideration. Peiper and Richter, however, attached more importance to the readings of A. They used the following mss. of that tradition (1) (a) Rehdigeranus (Stadt - bibliothek Breslau) 10 (now 118), (b) Rehdigeranus 14 (now 122), (c) Augustanus 23 (Kreis und Stadt - bibliothek zu Augsburg), (d) Vadianus 303 (St. Gallen)

Recent text - critical work by C. E. Stuart during the years 1906 to 1908 has brought valuable additions to our knowledge of the relation between certain mss., and the relative value of their readings. Stuart examined more than three hundred mss., and though he found none that compared in value with E, he discovered two of no inconsiderable worth that had hitherto been neglected: Cantabrigiensis 406 in the Library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and Parisiensis 8260 in the National Library, Paris . (2). These he named c and p respectively.

After a very thorough study of these mss. Stuart arrived at three general conclusions. I That c and p are mutually independent descendants of the archetype of all the interpolated or A mss., and are our best authorities for the text of A (1). The arguments presented in support of this conclusion are very plausible. c is a thirteenthcentury ms. written by several different scribes in a clear, fine hand. The order and titles of the tragedies are the same as those in the A mss. p seems to be in a French hand with the order and titles the same as in c. In minute details both are faithful to the same archetype. There are no indications of change of speakers, but in both the first letters of lines introducing new speakers are colored as though the rubricator understood the change. The archetype was a ms. full of contractions and difficult to read. In c the sign of interrogation is the same as the abbreviation for "ur". The same was true in the archetype. The errors in p are more numerous than those in c, and go farther from the true text. In accuracy c and p compare favorably with later mss. A great number of instances are cited by Stuart in which the readings of c and p are superior to those of  $\tau$  and  $\psi$ .

He also shows that  $\tau$  and  $\psi$  edit and interpolate to disguise errors which c and p faithfully retain.

It can also be shown that c and p are independent copies of the same archetype. c is not a copy of p because p omits lines which c contains. That p is not from c is clear from the errors of p not copied from c, from the fact that p contains one whole line and a few words which c omits; also because p leaves a space to indicate an omission while c does not. As p bears every mark of the truest A parentage, even its rather striking resemblances to E can hardly be due to contamination with the latter.

Stuart furthermore contends that c and p are the only independent copies of A and that of these c is the best. If  $\psi$ , which represents readings differing from A<sup>r</sup> among late Italian mss., were a third copy, it would not follow so many misreadings of c.

II. Second conclusion: That Treveth, for writing the commentary on the Tragedies which has hitherto been our best and oldest authority for the text of the A tradition, used either c itself, or a copy of c.

(1). The best mss. of the commentary of Treveth are 63 in the Library of the Society of Antiquaries, London (= Soc); Vaticanus 1650 (= Vat.), and Urbinas 355 (= Urb.). Of these the last is the least accurate and the first the most accurate. All of these are written on parchment, date from the fourteenth century, and contain a few words of Treveth's paraphrase. We indicate Treveth's readings by  $\tau$ . During gives a description of the commentary of Treveth which will be discussed a little later in this article.

All arguments used to prove that  $\psi$  mss. are derived from the common parent of c p apply to  $\tau$  and the accompanying texts.  $\tau$  and Soc. omit all lines omitted by c p. In Hercules Furens  $\tau$  follows c p rather than  $\psi$  in nine errors out of twenty and in nineteen out of thirty-one correct readings. In the other plays there are few discrepancies between  $\tau$  and c p. For Thyestes Stuart examined readings of  $\tau$  and found no corrections of c, though not a few mistakes.  $\psi$ , usually, and  $\tau$ , nearly always, agree with corrections of c even when it can be shown that they are conjectures. Some divergencies that occur in  $\tau$  and c may be explained by peculiarities in the writing of c. The text Soc. adheres to these peculiarities of c.

In summarizing the second conclusion that Stuart made we have three points to show remarkable agreement of the commentary of Treveth and the accompanying texts with c.

(1) That they contain no line not in c, and no words except such as are obviously interpolations.

(2) That they correct only such errors of c as Treveth might be expected to correct with <sup>the</sup> addition of other mss.

(3) That they are influenced by obscurities peculiar to the writing of c.

Stuart believes that Treveth used c and c only (p. 17)

III. Third conclusion: Except when contaminated with E the fourteenth and fifteenth century mss. of the A tradition seem to depend partly upon c itself, and entirely upon a ms. of which c is a very close copy. (pp. 17- 20) The ms. next to c and p which has thrown most light on the mutual relationship of the A mss. is 108 (T), iii, II in the Escorial Library called Scorialensis (Scor.), assigned to the latter half of the fourteenth century.

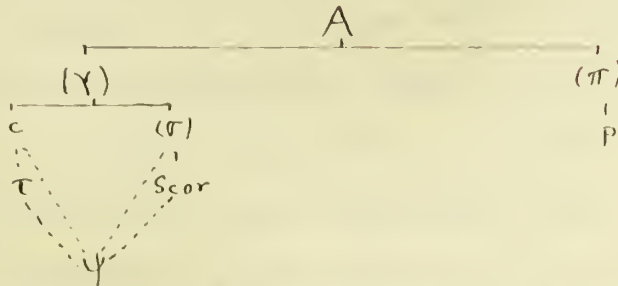

Scor. resembles c very closely, yet it is quite impossible that it should be derived from c because (1) Scor. contains Agamemnon 694 which c omits altogether also some words not in c; (2) where c makes no sign of omission in Hercules Furens before l. 90, Scor. like p leaves a space for the line, (3) in Hercules Oetaeus 642, c has an interpolation of two words to supply a loss while Scor., like p, has neither word, and Scor. leaves a space; (4) Scor. shows a considerable number of agreements with p against c.

The argument that applies to Scor. also applies to all the other  $\psi$  mss. The close resemblance of Scor. to c and its occasional agreements with the readings of p made Stuart conclude that both c and Scor. were derived from one copy of A which he chose to call  $\psi$  and that p was from another copy of A namely  $\pi$  (p. 18)

The family history of the A mss. is thus reconstructed in Stuart's article (p. 19)

In essentials Düring agrees with Stuart about these mss., but Düring has a few words to say about the value of the mss. mentioned above as being used by Peiper and Richter. In the first place they do not agree as closely as Richter in his apparatus criticus would have it appear. Vadianus and Rehdegeramus 14 (1) are worthless for the text of the Tragedies. The Treveth commentary gives good service in inquiring into the value of these readings. Rehdegeramus 10 is entirely unreliable. Augustanus ((Ag) in its original condition is the best of all the mss. of Richter.

Düring also shows the relation of several mss. to the archetype of A. He has p, c, and  $\chi$  as independent descendants of A, and n, b, and Ag as branches from , an unknown ancestor.

So much has been said about the commentary of Treveth and its relation to c that we should now notice the description of the commentary as given by Düring (1). Treveth divides each tragedy into parts or acts so that the choral parts are distinct from other speeches. In long dialogues he sometimes makes divisions. Troades, Agamemnon, and Hercules Oetaeus have seven acts; Phaedra and Oedipus, six; Hercules Furens, Thyestes, Medea, and Octavia five; and Phoenissae four.

The commentary takes up every word, poetical expression, geographical and mythological reference and explains them. Treveth seldom leaves a whole or half verse without comment. He often changes the order of words to make the sense more apparent to the reader. The Latin of his edition shows the confusion of the Middle Ages. Conjectures are not made where it is possible to explain the reading. Just as the Latin shows confusion we see signs of imperfect and confused sources as to geography and mythology. Isadore's Origines seem to have been the principal source of information. The author of the commentary did not have a superior grammatical understanding, and was satisfied with a reading that ran smoothly whether it added anything to the general sense or not. Treveth found some kind of a meaning in passages notoriously corrupt, even when some of them might easily have been corrected. He had a misconception of the duty of the scientific commentator, but he was faithful to his task, and with his stock of knowledge the best thing he could do was, no doubt, to conserve what he found, and explain it as best he could.

Düring is not ready to say that the ms. of Treveth is c or a copy of c but he does take up the relation between Treveth's mss. and c (1). He asks whether the correct readings which Treveth has in places where c is corrupted could be really conjectures of the commentator, whose skill and art he has shown to have been extremely meagre,

Where c and Treveth do not agree in some places, Treveth seems to have followed E, or perhaps a correction made on some copy of c. If the text of the commentary were a copy of c the differences would be those due to errors in copying and would not be of great importance. If Treveth's ms. were a copy of c then there must have been earlier mss. that had received correction, and though that is not impossible the Treveth text seems earlier than a copy of c.

C, according to Düring, is a clearly written, rather carefully corrected ms. and these corrections often stand above the incorrect letter or word. In almost all cases Treveth's commentary presumes the corrected reading. The abbreviations found in c have been interpreted in different ways by different copyists. So we can accept it as fairly well established that Treveth used a copy of c which had variants in the text due partly to omissions and partly to mistakes in copying.
